

our part to play in helping to create and maintain a healthy global economy. My message today, therefore, Mr. Speaker, is, therefore, a simple one and I am sorry to say an unglamorous one. It is that there is no alternative to negotiating calmly, in good faith and in good temper with our trading partners. It is an illusion to think otherwise. Above all, we must not let the problems that arise in the trade field spill into our defense relationships. Britain, Europe and America stand shoulder to shoulder in the defense of liberty, in the defense of the free world and in the defense of the free world's open trading system. What unites us is infinitely more important than what divides us. But in democratic societies our leaders derive their authority from us who elect them and they get subject to pressures from us who expect them to work on our behalf. So real life is a constant battle between the forces of enlightened self-interest and shortsighted selfishness within us all. And the question is, Mr. Speaker, which side are we on? Speaking personally, I am on the side of the angels and I feel sure that you, Mr. Speaker, are too. And if that is so, we can be confident that our leaders in Bonn, President Reagan, Prime Minister Thatcher, Chancellor Kohl and their colleagues will come up with the right answers. If they do, they will keep the world economy on which we all depend free from protectionism and on the path of noninflation regrowth to secure both our liberties and our prosperity. So I hope that any message to them from this great Unicameral Legislature will help them too, Mr. Speaker, to be on the side of the angels. Ladies and gentlemen, thank you.

SPEAKER NICHOL: Mr. Jensen, thank you for arranging this program this morning and we are certainly honored to have Sir Oliver Wright, our Ambassador from Great Britain, with us this morning. We certainly appreciate your efforts. We will come back to order and I believe we were discussing the Beutler amendment to the committee amendments and I believe that Senator Chambers was the next speaker. Senator Chambers.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Mr. Chairman and members of the Legislature, I got snookered yesterday on this bill. Senator DeCamp just explained that it wasn't his doing, he was not a part of it. But I got tricked. I listen to things that people say. This bill was to be bracketed till January so I took my kill motion off. I took it off
